ANCIENT LEGAL LORE.

THE BAR CENTURIES AGO. Advice of an Old Judicial Authority That

Applies to Lawyers of the Period. Tricks to Be Used with Opposing Connsel-Courtesy in the Court.

Law and lawyers fill an important place in English history. They are far more prom-inent than was the case even in ancient Greece or Rome; and every schoolhoy knows how large a share they had in public and domestic affairs in classical times. Some persons are to be met with who alleges that this is the most lawyer ridden country in the world. This may be true or otherwise, but it is curious and instructive to observe how legal usages and instructive to observe hos-legal usages and methods remain substan-tially the same as they were in the middle ages. A spirit of litigation prevailed then, as now, perhaps neither more or less. People are always apt to rush to the courts for a redress of wrongs, real or imaginary, and for the maintenance of rights supposed to be withheld or impaired.

Not every one has found time or oppor-tunity to look into the "Speculum Juris" or "Mirror of Justica." Briefless barristers, and some plenders who fall with judge and jury, might do worse than take a survey. It is a Was never shipped to this city than that which we have just received and which is ready for your inspection.

All of these goods were carefully selected by us personally in the foremost eastern markets, and they are worthy of Wichit's culture and tasts. It will pay you well to drop in and look around, and feast your eyes on a truly metropolitan stock of work written by one Guillaume Durand, who flourished about six centuries ago, and thority. It was extensively transcribed at a time when the art of printing was unknown, and it was issued from the press, in a com-manding folio form, several times during the writer had passed away.

This oracle gives advice as to appearance, behavior and modes of speech, such as were calculated to insure success in the law courts, When he wrote clergymen were also lawyers, as they were statemen and administrators. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that Durand became bishop of Mende. He was a native of Provence; but French ecclesiastics were then very numerous in England—not always to the complete satisfaction of the na-tives. However, he seems to have been successful as an advocate while here, and he frankly explains how he succeeded for the a quarter of a teaspoonful of soda, a teaspoonful of solt is fit the salt and soda in the state of a teaspoonful of solt is four to be sure they are well mixed. other side, from which it is to be inferred that references to "my learned friend" were not always of the most respectful char-acter. Instead of this being done, it is well to treat him decorously, "unless, indeed, he treat you rudely." This, a saving clause, is susceptible of wide application. "When replying to his arguments, you should commend him slightly, but not too much, and commend him by equivocal words." Examples are given showing that the writer was a master of dialects and verbai refinements, not to say quirks and quibbles. Mr. Serjeant Buziux is a character of remote antiquity.

Great provocation was sometimes experienced at the ber. Counsel were touchy or imperious, especially to juniors. "You must not treat your adversary with contumely, or call him in plain words a rufflan or a prevarientor, or insinuate as much by saying 'I am not a thief,' thereby intimating that he is." If matters went to an extremity, and if in a moment of irritation he brought a charge of falsehood, then "you may safely say, 'You are a liar,' but protest that you say so not with intent to injure him, but only to defend your own cause."

Ludges are but men, and therefore are lin-ble to human infirmities. It is to be feared that their tempers were not always perfect 600 years ago. Doubtiess, they had much to try them, in stupid or prevaricating witnesses, and even in the bearing of counsel. Durand devotes much space to suggestions and warnings as to behavior in court. On enter-ing, the first thing to be done was to remove the cap and make an obeliance. This was to be graduated according to the rank of the judge. "His honor" in a county court is not entitled, presumably, to so much deferences as "my lord" in one of the supreme courts. There were no stipendiaries or registrars in those days. Otherwise, it might be a curious inquiry as to how much of "obeisance" they should receive. But it is evident that judges 1700 were sometimes angry, with or without cause. If so, "do not rejoin." They might even be sarcastic. Still it was better not to retaliate. Lequacity was to be guarded against, for the brach did not like it. Care fore the judge, "lest be might imagine that it was at him. "When he speaks, listen remust be taken "not to laugh causelessly be spectfully, and then laud his wisdom and Durand enumerates sundry judicial qualities which counsel might praise and imagnity; "but be careful about attributing all to one person." In other words, keep a reserve stock of complimentary phrases, suitable for other judges. He careful not to say anything to offend, "for it is a hazardous thing to have a suit before an offended judge," I might even be well to convey a hint that he knows everything, while your knowledge is infinitesimal. Manner also is all important. Purchased expressly for this season's It is well to rise eracefully, not arrocantly, 600 and to put on an affable and pleasant look, even if the feelings be the reverse, some modern counsel must have been present, at any rate by a sort of anticipatory metempsychosis, when we read that certain advocates "rub the face, push their hair be-hind the ears, blow the nose loudly, clear the throat, examine their hands and their dress alternately lift their eyes to heaven and bow their head, wrinkle the forehead, compress the lips, frown and fix their bands on their lips."

These old counsel had a trick, it appears, of keeping the advocate on the other side waiting so long in court as to wear out his pae. Or they would cumningly pretend to be asleep during his arguments. Durand disapproves of this. He also mivises that the opposing counsel be not left behind, lest he should earwig the judge. The advocate of old standing was to beware of the younger nes. They had the law fresh and kept themselves informed on recent decisions. By dillcence and a desire for barren bonor, they sometimes won a victory over their seniors, who became idle and careless, "The junior is to speak first. The senior is to follow, in order that his specious and experienced arguments may be better remembered by the judge. But both should agree on the course that their specches take, and if one of them is making a mess of it the cisent should stop him, for an ox and an ass should not plow gether." Finally, the advice is given not to take a law fee for pleading, lost reputation be lost. "Undertake those causes only which you can conscientiously advocate. If a cause be desperate, give it up." It will be seen that most of the types of legal character delineated by Duranc are still existing. Much of his advice seems to be practiced, and the remainder is not undeserving of careful reflection.—Letter in London Graphic.

Where Cigars Are Carried.

I have a good deal of quiet fun to myself watching where people put their eigurs. Of course your business man has his cigar case or he puts his cigars in his vest pocket. The Irishman who is a laborer sticks his surplus cigar in his bat band. I have seen a police man buy torse or four cigars and put them on the made of his hat. - Chicago Times.
